A response you regret gives you something to work on.

You leave a conversation wishing you had handled it differently.

An assumption to examine

Getting better means becoming a different person.

Look at one ordinary moment.

Someone interrupts you. You answer sharply before asking them to finish their concern.

Observe before deciding.

Write down what happened just before the response you regret.

Choose one response to practice.

Choose one recurring trigger and prepare a response you want to practice when it appears.

Look back together.

What did you give priority to, and what would you choose next time? Save this for your next conversation.
