What can you responsibly do with what you have today?

You can describe the ideal response, but you keep postponing the conversation.

An assumption to examine

An imperfect response is a reason not to begin.

Look at one ordinary moment.

You postpone useful feedback because you cannot find a version that feels perfect.

Observe before deciding.

Notice where preparation becomes a way to avoid beginning.

Choose one response to practice.

Name the standard you want to uphold and choose one responsible step you can take now.

Look back together.

What did the attempt teach you, and what must you adjust without lowering your obligations? Save this for your next conversation.