

Good at the task.
That tells us something about the work someone can do. It doesn't tell us everything about leading the people doing it.

In my TEDx talk, I described a familiar way people become leaders.

Someone does a thing well. We put them in charge of others doing that thing.

The responsibility changes.
The person now has to think about the people doing the work.
Their own ability to do it is only part of that responsibility.

We call it a reward.
But doing a good job and taking responsibility for other people are different things. The promotion puts them in a different position.

Look at the assumption.
We saw someone do the work well. Then we treated that as enough preparation to lead the people doing it.
