Your team can look busy.
And still be waiting for you.

Matt Krall
mattkrall.com

You want fewer mistakes.
So more decisions come through you.

But when making the wrong call feels risky, waiting can feel safer than deciding.

The decision pauses.
The next step pauses.
People wait for an answer you hold.

Control can slow
the very decisions
you want to improve.

Start with one recurring decision. Where does it stop?

Go upstream.
What is making your approval necessary?

If the goal is unclear, name the outcome before you review the next step.

If the boundary
is unclear,
agree what they can decide and when to ask for input.

If the owner
is unclear,
put one name beside the decision.

Trust needs somewhere to show up.

A clear handoff is one place to start.

Make it specific.
One decision.
One owner.
One clear boundary.
One review point.

Test it in real life.
Give that decision room to move. Then review what happened.

Explore a clearer way to lead.

Find out more at mattkrall.com